INSTRUCTIONS.

A few practical remarks to persons about to plant new gardens and pleasure grounds, also to those renovating or replanting old ones, when no professional gardener is employed, the proprietor has to superintend preparing the grounds and planting, and it frequently occurs that for want of a little practical advice, suffer losses and disappointments. In preparing the ground for planting, it should be spaded at least two feet deep; if it is a light sandy soil, mix some clay or heavy loam and leaf soil or top soil from the woods; if the soil is heavy loam, mix with it plenty of leaf soil. In planting, care should be taken not to plant too close together. In filling up old grounds, do not plant near large, strong growing deciduous or evergreen trees. It is often the case that a new and rare evergreen is planted near large trees, and when the hot, dry summer commences, the large trees take all the moisture from the surrounding soil, and the plant seldom lives over one season. In planting evergreens, small plants are the best, from one to three feet in height, according to the growth of the different varieties. Frequent application is made for large plants from five to eight feet. To plant evergreens of that size, it is all chance that one in five will live, with the exception of some of the commonest kinds. After planting, all the rare and valuable kinds should be mulched and shaded. There may be some who do not understand what is intended by mulching and shading. Mulching may be done by covering the ground around the plant with half decayed leaves or pine straw, about three inches thick; this prevents evaporation, and in watering prevents the water from running off. Water should be applied twice per week during the hot summer months, if the weather is very dry. For shading, procure pine branches, sharpen the ends and plant them firmly in the ground on the South side of the plant; renew the pine branch when the foliage drops off. By attending to these few simple directions, few complaints will be made of the loss of newly planted evergreens.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The season for removing evergreens is from the first of November to the first of March, before and after that time it is unsafe to remove them, except when grown in pots.

It frequently occurs that before the end of the season some varieties are sold out, except small plants; to ensure the filling orders in full, send them early.

After delivering into the hands of the forwarders, as per directions, and a receipt taken for the same, they will be entirely at the risk of the purchaser.

A small charge made for packing, to cover the cost of the material.

TERMS CASH ONLY.
